

One hour later – have your say

Research into late night travel aspirations

We asked people which modes of transport they used on their last journey from central London after 10pm...

This showed us that of all the options available, people still preferred to use the tube to get home.

When asked why people preferred to use the Underground they gave the following answers...

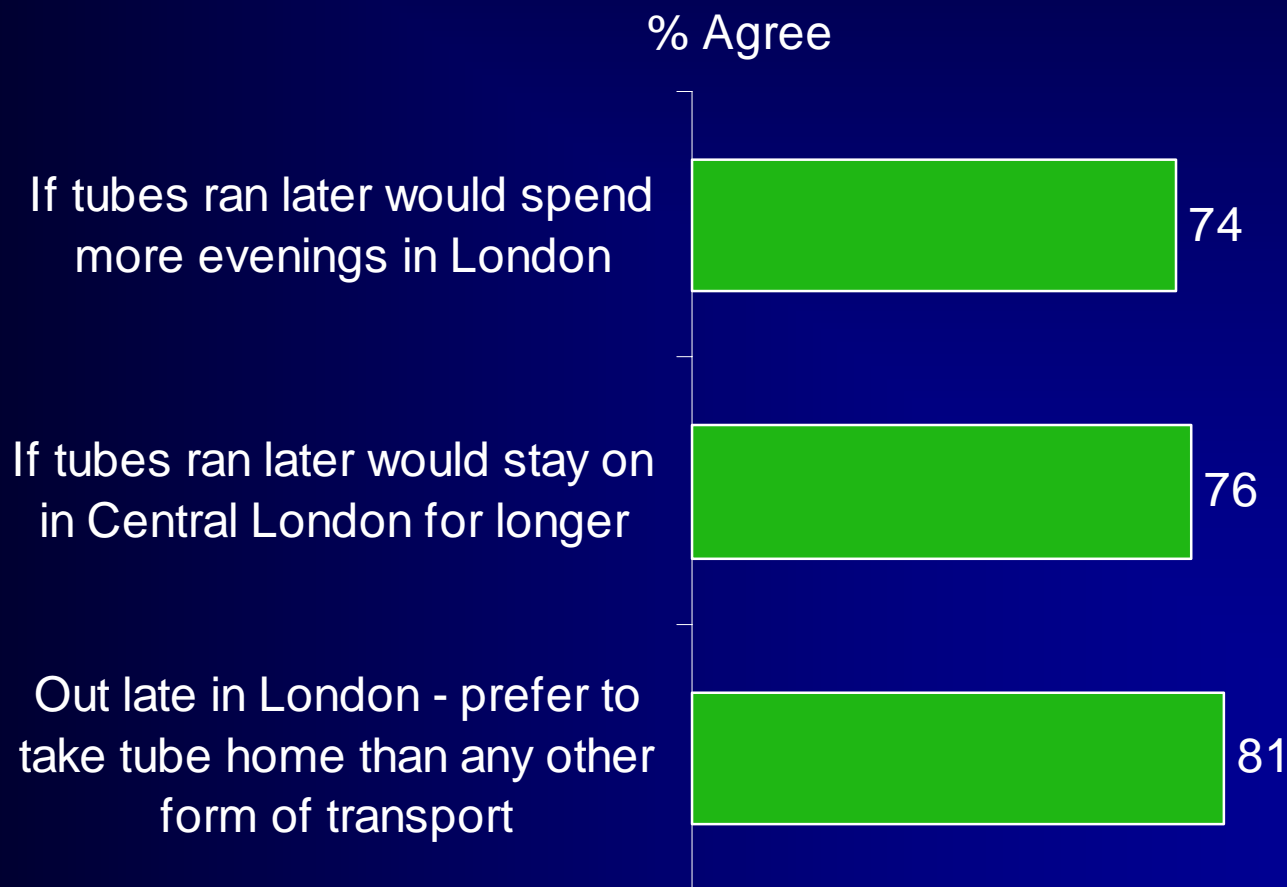

We then asked people to compare their experiences of the tube against Night Buses...

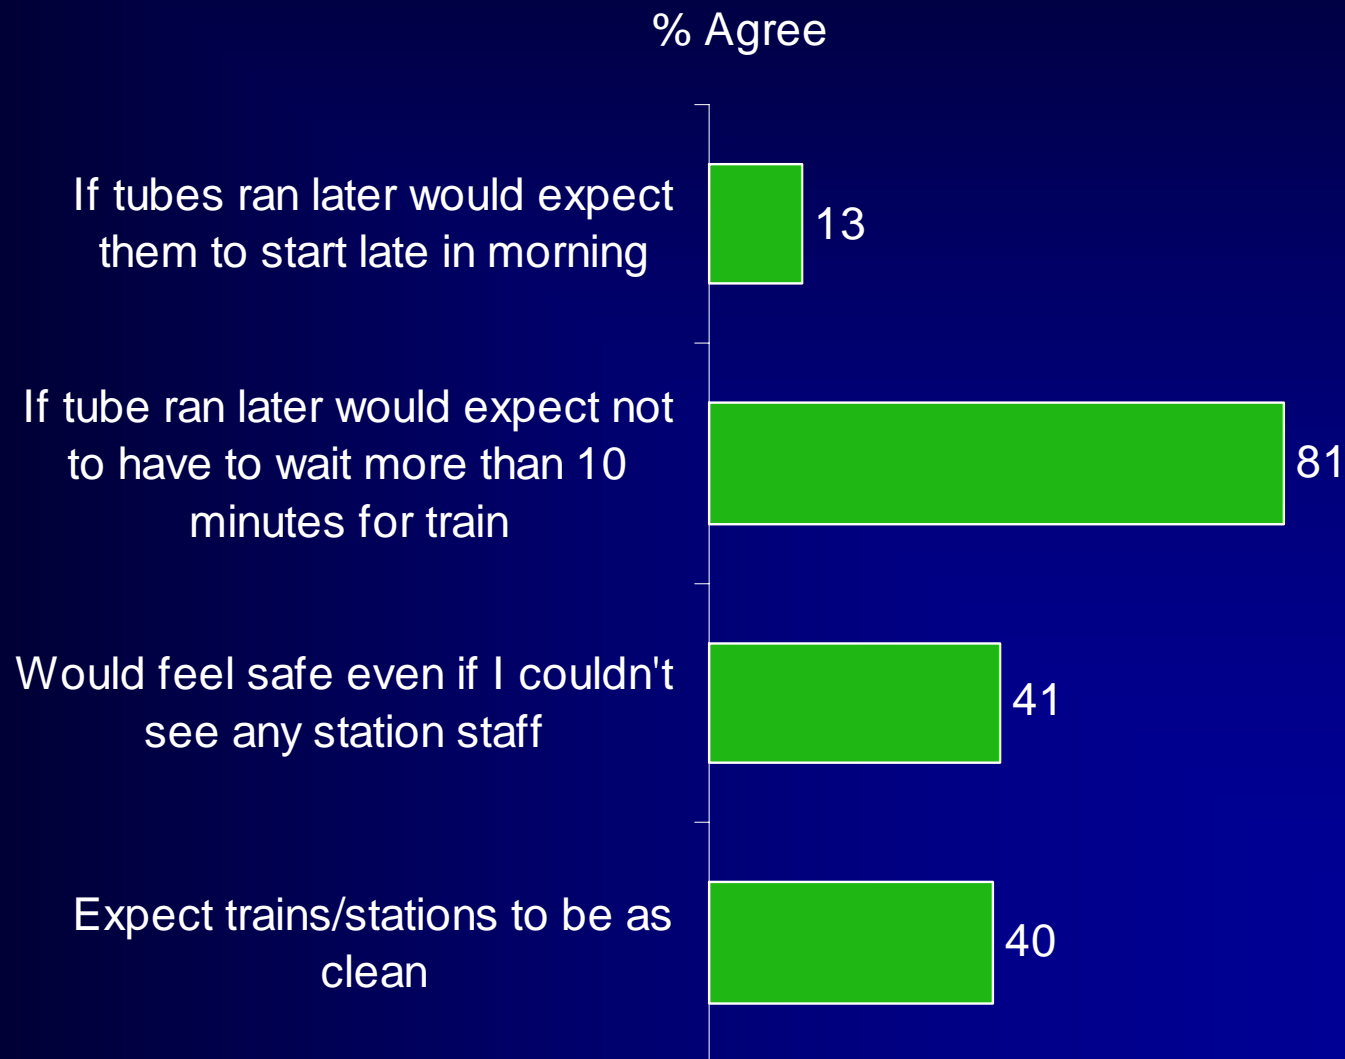

By asking people when they thought the last train was too early, we found that the majority of people wanted to stay out later on a Friday and Saturday night...

To understand how people and the London economy would benefit from running the tube later, we asked how it would change people's travel habits...

We also wanted to know what people would expect if we decided to run trains later in the evenings:

Research into early morning weekend travel

We wanted to understand who was using the early morning weekend tubes and why they were travelling at that time:

On both a Saturday and Sunday morning, more than 50% of respondents were travelling to or from work each day.

A number of early morning travellers are going to work, so we asked those people what sector they worked in:

So that we could understand how important the availability of the tube was to travellers at this time, we asked how often they made this early morning trip:

The split between regular and irregular was close, with the majority using it more regularly than once a month.

London offers a wealth of alternative travel options and we needed to know which of those were available to early morning travellers to complete their journey:
